

Dr Divina Frau-Meigs, University of Paris 3-Sorbonne, Professor, Focal point for the WSIS Taskforce on “Education, Academia and Research”, ex-vice-president of IAMCR, director of the master’s programme in “e-learning engineering”

Divina Frau-Meigs, a Fulbright scholar, is professor of American studies and media sociology at the Université Paris 3-Sorbonne, France. With degrees from the Sorbonne University, Stanford University and the Annenberg School for Communications (University of Pennsylvania), she is a specialist of media and information technologies in English-speaking countries, in a comparative perspective. She is also a research associate with CNRS. Her other activities include being editor-in-chief of Revue Française d'Etudes Américaines (RFEA) and a member of the editorial board of MédiaMorphoses (INA-Colin).

She has published extensively in the areas of media content (Les Ecrans de la Violence, Economica, 1997; Jeunes, Médias, Violences, Economica, 2003), information and journalism (Qui a détourné le 11 septembre? Journalisme, information et démocratie, DeBoeck, 2006) the technologies and sub-cultures of the screen (Médias et Technologie: l'exemple des Etats-Unis, Ellipses, 2001) and the relationship between media and technologies (Le crime organisé à la ville et à l'écran, 1929-1951, Armand Colin, 2001; Médiamorphoses américaines, Economica, 2001). Many of her published articles deal with on-line extensions of such issues as media content, information and (self)regulation. In 2007 for UNESCO, she edited a multimedia kit on Media education, with 5 guidebooks (for teachers, students, parents and media professionals) available on-line at unesco.org (in French and English).

She is currently working on issues of cultural diversity, acculturation, media education and e-learning in a global perspective. She has held the UNESCO chair for information-communication at the Universidad Autonoma in Barcelona, giving a doctoral course on globalization and cultural diversity (Autumn 2006); she has also organized the first graduate students encounters on cultural diversity in Montreal (December 2006). Her other research interests deal with issues of media regulation and self-regulation, for which she is an expert with UNESCO, the European Union, the Council of Europe and a variety of governmental agencies.

She has served as vice-president for international affairs on the boards of Société Française des Sciences de l'Information et de la Communication (SFSIC) and has been vice-president of the International Association for Media and Communications Research (IAMCR), as well as a founding member of ECCR which has become ECREA (the European Communications Research and Education Association). In the World Summit on Information Society (2001-2005), she led the coalition on “education, academia and research” and as such was a member of the civil society bureau. In 2006 she was awarded the “E-Toile d’Or” of the l’Internet for her work on the research and promotion of new information technologies.
